4. Through this process, we explain university culture to learners so they can learn its requirements through _____ (学徒制) (Paltridge, 2004; Wenger, 1998). These notions are expanded by _____ (建构主义者) whose views _____ (符合) academic literacy perspectives.
5. Teaching via _____ (作品集; 档案袋) allows students to _____ (质问) _____ (受到文化制约的) aspects of discourse in AW, and to notice and make judgments about cultural norms in text types.
6. Empirical studies are starting to _____ (为此作证).
7. _____ (与...一致) Atkinson (2003b, p. 49), we investigate "_____ (连续性, 普遍性, 杂交性), whereas the culture concept has traditionally been used to investigate difference, _____ (本地化), and cultural _____ (纯粹性)", _____ (回应他的呼吁), for teachers of AW to understand what they are teaching more critically.
8. Usefully, he suggests a "difference-as-resource" perspective in order to _____ (解构) any _____ (意识形态载体) used in teaching materials and _____ (隐含的) in the act of teaching written discourses belonging to a powerful discourse community. Such _____ (教学法) _____ (与...兼容的) teaching AW via portfolio.
9. Grace (China) is also _____ (敏锐地) aware of the _____ (以读者为中心) of her target text.
10. Either _____ (反常地) or _____ (颠覆性地), Yuka (Japan) said that he had _____ (习得) a consciousness of 'Western' AW strategies.
11. It also _____ both _____ (迎合) the individual and the group.
12. Our findings suggest instructors and researchers can _____ (深入了解) learning AW within a _____ (多稿的), process-based portfolio pedagogy by seeking _____ (趋同; 交集) in the thinking of writing theorists, most recently those advocating the process/genre _____ (连接; 联系).
13. Discourse communities are _____ (密不可分地) connected to student investments in AW and multi-draft portfolios represent a union of assessment and learning.

1. Triangulating data came from student reflective memoranda written in response to each drafting process.
2. Three core issues we foreground emerge from recent research: the value of peer collaboration, the importance of reflexivity and portfolio assessment's formative potential.
3. To contextualise the text type in terms of its discourse community and to maintain focus on micro and macro aspects of textual development, pre-writing, peer and teacher feedback, and revision are fundamental practices for process-based approaches (Hamp-Lyons & Condon, 2000).
4. Through this process, we explain university culture to learners so they can learn its requirements through apprenticeship (Paltridge, 2004; Wenger, 1998). These notions are expanded by constructionists whose views accord with academic literacy perspectives.
5. Teaching via portfolio allows students to interrogate culturally bound aspects of discourse in AW, and to notice and make judgments about cultural norms in text types.
6. Empirical studies are starting to bear this out.
7. Along with Atkinson (2003b, p. 49), we investigate "continuity, universality, and hybridity, whereas the culture concept has traditionally been used to investigate difference, localisation, and cultural purity", responding to his call for teachers of AW to understand what they are teaching more critically.
8. Usefully, he suggests a "difference-as-resource" perspective in order to deconstruct any ideological freight used in teaching materials and implicit in the act of teaching written discourses belonging to a powerful discourse community. Such pedagogy is compatible with teaching AW via portfolio.
9. Grace (China) is also acutely aware of the reader-centredness of her target text.
10. Either perversely or subversively, Yuka (Japan) said that he had acquired a consciousness of 'Western' AW strategies, but those he used were "from the Japanese way".
11. It also caters both to the individual and the group.
12. Our findings suggest instructors and researchers can gain insights into learning AW within a multi-draft, process-based portfolio pedagogy by seeking convergences in the thinking of writing theorists, most recently those advocating the process/genre nexus.
13. Discourse communities are inextricably connected to student investments in AW and multi-draft portfolios represent a union of assessment and learning.
