

1. Plagiarism is a major problem for universities worldwide and has been a _____ (持续引发忧虑的问题) in higher education.
2. Increasing media reports of “scandals” of cheating and plagiarism involving university students _____ (破坏公众信心) in the _____ (学术诚信) of higher education.
3. Despite this _____ (迅速增加的研究) on Chinese teachers and students, _____ (很少有人关注) universities’ policies on plagiarism in the Chinese context.
4. This lack of research about institutional policies on plagiarism in China is both surprising and _____ (引人注目的) _____ (鉴于) the _____ (前述假设) about cultural and educational influences on Chinese students' intertextual practices.
5. A knowledge of Chinese universities’ institutional policies on plagiarism can _____ (有助于全面地理解) how international students from China _____ (看待) plagiarism, and how their previous educational contexts in China may have _____ (影响他们的观念和做法).
6. Unfortunately, _____ (现有极少的实证研究) in this area that can _____ (被借鉴) to develop such a knowledge.
7. The academic writing discourse recognizes plagiarism as a concept that is not readily _____ (受...的影响) an unambiguous universal definition, academic writing as a social practice that involves _____ (作者意图和身份的协商), and students as developing academic writers who need educative support in their _____ (对学术素养的掌握和沉浸).
8. Recent reviews of research on institutional policies (e.g., Liu et al., 2016; Pecorari & Petric, 2014; Stuhmcke et al., 2016) have _____ (呼吁) universities to move away from a moralistic punitive approach/discourse to an educative one that _____ (以学术素养为中心).
9. In China, like elsewhere, “_____ (抢头条的大学抄袭丑闻)” (Pecorari, 2015, p. 97) in recent years have _____ (引起...的关注) the educational authorities and institutions of higher education alike.
10. From the official websites of these universities, academic ethics texts were _____ (摘抄) which provided information such as the universities’ _____ (关于学术诚信的一般规定), procedures and _____ (对学术不端的制裁), as well as the use of _____ (查重软件).
11. The _____ (文件所述的学术不端) comprised mostly _____ (道德问题), rather than academic issues.
12. Furthermore, _____ (没有人承认) of plagiarism as a _____ (有争议的) concept and of acceptable intertextual practices as _____ (随着...变化) with time and disciplinary settings.
13. This problem _____ (主要起源于) the _____ (显著缺乏) of an institutionally envisioned role for disciplinary experts and writing teachers in socializing students into _____ (合规的) academic literacy practices.
14. Finally, findings of our study help to _____ (揭示) second language student writers' confusion and frustration _____ (在面对...时) conceptions of plagiarism _____ (盛行且被认可的) in English-speaking _____ (学界).
15. To _____ (更全面地理解) institutional policies, certain _____ (研究方向) are _____ (值得探索).

1. Plagiarism is a major problem for universities worldwide and has been a constant cause of concern in higher education.
2. Increasing media reports of “scandals” of cheating and plagiarism involving university students undermine public faith in the academic integrity of higher education and its members
3. Despite this rapidly growing body of research on Chinese teachers and students, little attention has been given to universities’ policies on plagiarism in the Chinese context.
4. This lack of research about institutional policies on plagiarism in China is both surprising and conspicuous in view of the mentioned assumptions about cultural and educational influences on Chinese students’ intertextual practices
5. A knowledge of Chinese universities’ institutional policies on plagiarism can contribute to a more comprehensive understanding of how international students from China make sense of plagiarism, and how their previous educational contexts in China may have shaped their perceptions and practices.
6. Unfortunately, there is a paucity of empirical research in this area that can be drawn on to develop such a knowledge.
7. The academic writing discourse recognizes plagiarism as a concept that is not readily susceptible to an unambiguous universal definition, academic writing as a social practice that involves negotiations of authorial intentions and identities, and students as developing academic writers who need educative support in their immersion in and acquisition of academic literacy.
8. Recent reviews of research on institutional policies (e.g., Liu et al., 2016; Pecorari & Petric, 2014; Stuhmcke et al., 2016) have called for universities to move away from a moralistic punitive approach/discourse to an educative one that centers on academic literacy.
9. In China, like elsewhere, “headline-catching university plagiarism scandals” (Pecorari, 2015, p.97) in recent years have drawn the attention of the educational authorities and institutions of higher education alike.
10. From the official websites of these universities, academic ethics texts were extracted which provided information such as the universities’ general regulations on academic integrity, procedures and sanctions for academic misconduct, as well as the use of text-matching software.
11. The academic misconduct delineated in the documents comprised mostly ethical problems, rather than academic issues.
12. Furthermore, there was no acknowledgment of plagiarism as a contested concept and of acceptable intertextual practices as subject to change with time and disciplinary settings.
13. This problem arose largely from the conspicuous lack of an institutionally envisioned role for disciplinary experts and writing teachers in socializing students into legitimate academic literacy practices.
14. Finally, findings of our study help to shed light on second language student writers’ confusion and frustration in the face of conceptions of plagiarism prevalent and sanctioned in English-speaking academia.
15. To develop a more comprehensive understanding of institutional policies, certain research directions are worth exploring.